The Body as a Confession	Mariam Hegab	05/10/2026	1.0

Products and Services

- Fleshy, organic sculpture caged in rigid metal
- Touch sensors in its surface
- Mechanism that swells and is compressed
- Feedback through movement, sound and light

Gain Creators

- Gentle touch lets the form expand past its frame
- The object "breathes" in response and feels alive
- Pulls the viewer from repulsion toward attraction

Pain Relievers

- Rough or fast touch makes it contract, so viewers feel what control costs
- Touch becomes a release, not a correction
- A confession without words; no one has to speak

Gains

- Relief, a feeling of expanding
- Finding beauty in a form first seen as repulsive
- Seeing ugliness as a learned way of looking
- Permission to be soft and alive

Customer Jobs

- Express what they hold in
- Trace where their idea of "ugly" came from
- Feel seen without explaining
- Release tension held in the body

Pains

- Feeling compressed, corrected and controlled
- Years spent learning to hate their body
- Repression with no outlet
- Fear of being looked at

Value Proposition

A body-like object caged in metal that shrinks under force and expands under care, asking whether ugliness lives in the form or in how we learned to see it.

Customer Segment

People who feel confined by how their body or identity is supposed to look, such as young women and queer and gender-nonconforming people.
